

Alyssa Renaud, M.A.

Film/Production

Alyssa Renaud graduated from Boston College with a bachelor's degree in communications and film and earned a master's degree in journalism from Emerson College.

Ms. Renaud loves creating videos. She has been a news reporter since she joined her high school newspaper. She produced digital videos for the USA TODAY Network, where she covered national news topics in politics, entertainment and travel. While there, Ms. Renaud received two company quarterly awards for video editing.

Ms. Renaud has experience as a freelance writer for an Air Force Base newspaper, a women's online magazine and a tech news site. She has directed and produced her own short films and worked on other film projects as a video editor and production assistant.

Ms. Renaud is passionate about media education. She was a graduate assistant for Emerson College's high school summer journalism program and mentored high school students in video production from all over the Boston area while an intern for The Transformative Culture Project.

In her free time, Ms. Renaud can be found writing, reading, watching films or cooking. She is an avid traveler, having visited most of the United States and several European countries. Her hometown is Oklahoma City, though she grew up in a military family that lived in many places.
